CULTURE AND STORAGE

Gladioli, like all cultivated crops, need some thought in regard to culture. While they will grow and bloom under most conditions, it is necessary to observe certain things to bring out the best there is in any variety. The soil should be well prepared, and reasonably rich. A good grade of potato fertilizer or bone meal may be used if needed; but if the ground is reasonably rich nothing need be added for satisfactory bloom. Spade deep and pulverize thoroughly. Gladioli to do their best must have plenty of fresh air and sunshine.

Plantings may be made any time from early garden-making time until the middle of June for the latitude of Sturgis. There should be nearly a week's difference for every one hundred miles south. Plant in rows five to six inches deep, placing bulbs right up four to six inches apart. Rows should be not less than eighteen inches apart.

Cultivate often and thoroughly. Do not allow the ground to bake around the plants.

After the foliage has begun to die down or been cut by the frost the bulbs should be lifted and the tops cut off near the bulb with a pair of grass shears. They should be placed in shallow crates or boxes and set in the sun for a few days to dry, after which they may be placed in any building where they can get plenty of air until time to place in cellar or storage for winter.

FOR CUT FLOWERS.

Cut spike when first bud opens, leaving at least four or five leaves on stalk to mature the bulb. Place in water and change the water each day at the same time cutting a little off the end of stem. Placing flowers in the cellar at night will add to the life of the bloom.
